The lecture, we attended last Wednesday, was about an economics dilemma "Is it better to be an employer or an employee". The opinions were divided. The students who thought that being an employee is safer used an argument that employees, even if they got fired, can always find a new job and it is easier than starting a new business. The pro-employers supported their decision saying that at first it might be hard to start a new business, but when it starts running by itself you can literally sit on your private yacht and do nothing. Finally we came to a conclusion that being an employer is better.

It was really interesting and gave us a different perspective on the problem of being self-employed.
